For a long, long time the U. S. had Bill Larned occupying a lone some throne, and when Larned abdicated and McLoughlin took his place was generally agreed that the Californian's reign would be even more of despotism than that established by his famous predecessor.

At the end of that summer week a year ago when the Western meteor defeated Norman Brookes and followed this victory by crushing the mighty Wilding, there was no one in close sight to be even compared with the brilliant Californian, who immediately took his place as the greatest tennis

The Unexpected Shift.

But since that double victory over Brookes and Wilding-one of the greatest sportive achievements of all time-McLoughlin's crown has been folted dangerously near the edge of his crimson dome

For since that display of tennis last summer McLoughlin has been beaten in three important matches-twice by Williams and once by Behrand in each defeat he was clearly outplayed by his winning rival.

Out of four matches against R. N. Williams the Californian ha

1914-1915.

When Williams, after losing both matches to Brookes and Wilding, beat McLoughlin at Newport the victory was regarded largely as a fluke.

But Williams has proved twice since that it was no fluke-first by defeating Behr, McLoughlin's conqueror at Seabright, and by again beating the Comet by far greater all around play.

Causes and Effects.

Two reasons only can be offered for this decided shift from the summer of last year. First, that Williams has improved immensely. Second, that Stars Well Separated in McLoughlin, abandoning a large part of his comet attack, has lost ground the country are well separated in the has left him far more vulnerable.
